WCCC Championship

Michael Bury again captures the 33rd annual West Chester Chess Club Championship.

In this year's tourney there was plenty of action. In the first round Charles Jay gave Michael Bury all he could handle. After acquiring 2 queens, and some over-confidence, to none for Michael, Charles snatched too soon a rook sacrifice and blundered into a stalemate.

In round two, Larry Saxby (1529) won over Joe Mucerino (2122) to capture the "Greatest Upset Award".

Keith Johnson demonstrated exceptional endgame play in round 3 with a convincing win over Hans Hermans.

In round 4, Mike Spaziani took all the board space from Margaret Brakel but managed to lose anyway.

In the finale, Michael Bury and Joe Mucerino traded combinations like championship boxers. But in the end, Michael knocked Mucerino out to capture the title.

The "Under 1600" winner is Andrew Fleming with 3 ½ points. The "Under 12 Years Old" winner is Peter Mason with 2 ½ points.

Cross tables for the championship will appear in the next newsletter as all the space in this issue is devoted to games.

Grandmaster Siegbert Tarrasch (1862-1934) famously said, "Before the endgame, the gods have placed the middlegame." But that doesn't mean that one shouldn't concern himself with the coming endgame while the middlegame is still going on. While it is true that one is often concerned with slash-and-burn tactics in the middlegame, so that considerations of endgame pawn structure or of endgame piece advantages take a back seat to king-hunting, there are still many times when one can plan ahead for the endgame while still playing the middlegame. The following game from the third round of the recent club championship tournament, provides an example.

1.e4 d6 2.d4 ♘f6 3.♗c3 g6 4.♗f3 ♕g7 5.♖e2 c6 6.0-0 0-0 7.♖f4 ♗h5 8.♖g3 ♗xg3 9.fxg3

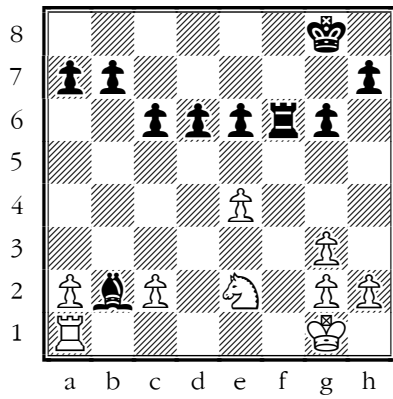

At the non-master level, it might not be clear why this is wrong; the game is young, and it might seem that having the half-open f-file on which to attack is no small matter. The pawn structure on move nine might not resemble the endgame pawn structure very closely, so the crippling of White's pawns might not seem very important--in many a swashbuckling game, after all, pawn structure takes a back seat to the king-hunt. According to our resident master, though, it is clear that this is a mistake: In such positions the opening of the f-file almost never sufficiently compensates for the crippling of White's pawns. As will be seen, taking with the f-pawn will create a crippled three-on-two pawn majority for White, meaning that White will not be able to force the creation of a passed pawn and that Black will be able to stop White's three pawns with his own two. The main point I want to make now is this: If you're playing the Black side in such a position, you should notice the crippled pawn island and, even at this early juncture, you should think about how to turn it into an endgame win.

9...♗d7 10.♖c4 e5 11.dxe5 ♗xe5 12.♗xe5 ♖xe5 13.♗f3 ♖e6 [Michael Bury points out if Black had moved... 13...♗b6+ 14.♗h1 ♗xb2 15.♗e2 (15..♖xf7+ ♗g7 16.♗e2 ♖e6! winning the Bishop.) 15...♖e6] 14.♖xe6 fxe6

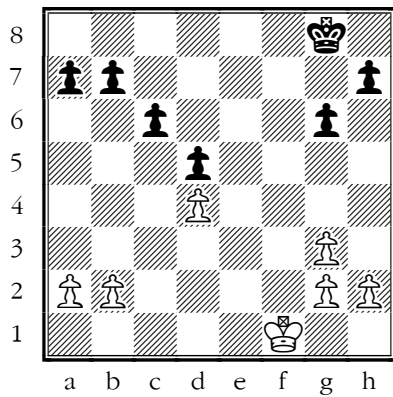

Now look at the pawns. Black has a healthy five-on-four pawn majority on the queenside and in the center, while White's three-on-two pawn majority on the kingside is crippled. Without help from any piece, Black can force a passed pawn on the queenside or in the center, while White cannot force a passed pawn on the kingside without piece help. (On the other hand, if White's kingside pawns were on the g- and f-files, as they would be had White recaptured with his h-pawn, White could make a passed pawn, if he got his forward g-pawn to g4 before Black put his h-pawn on h5; despite doubling the g-pawn, taking with the h-pawn would not have resulted in the same crippling of the kingside pawn island that taking with the f-pawn resulted in. So, on move nine, White shouldn't think, "Well, I'll double my g-pawn either way, and if I take with the f-pawn I'll at least get a half-open f-file for my rooks." Taking with the f-pawn is definitely worse for the endgame than is taking with the h-pawn--it creates a permanent, structural weakness that can be exploited in the endgame, in a way that taking with the h-pawn does not.) If the game reaches a king-and-pawn ending with this pawn structure, Black will win. So, if Black has the opportunity, he should steer the game toward a king-and-pawn ending. He might not have the chance; there's still plenty of opportunity for middlegame play, and White may be expected not to cooperate with Black's plans. But Black has an advantage White doesn't have: He can feel free to trade pieces if he wants to. White has to try to keep pieces on the board, unless he can nullify Black's potential endgame advantage.

15.♗g4 ♖f6 16.♖xf6 ♗xf6 17.♗f3 [17.♖f1?? ♖d4+ 18.♗h1 ♗xf1#] 17...♖f8 18.♗xf6 ♖xf6 19.♗e2 [19.♖f1??] 19...d5 [Missed was... 19...♖xb2

20.♖b1 ♕a3 21.♖xb7?? ♕c5+ 22.♖h1 ♖f1+ 23.♗g1 ♖xg1#] 20.exd5 exd5 21.c3 ♕c7 22.♖f1 ♖b6+ 23.♗d4 ♕xd4+ 24.cxd4 ♖xf1+ 25.♖xf1

After this, it's a sure win for Black. Black might not have perfect endgame technique, and he might misplay it into a theoretical draw at some point; but Black should win this without undue difficulty. Both kings will move toward the center; Black's two kingside pawns will stop White's crippled threesome; Black will force a passed pawn on the queenside; White's king will be forced to give up ground and move backward and let the passed pawn advance; and then Black will be able to walk away and pick off other White pawns while White's king is busy taking the passed pawn, enabling Black to win. The first passed pawn created, the one that will result from the four-on-three queenside majority, will end up being a decoy!

25...♖f7 26.♖e2 ♖e6 27.♖e3 b6 28.b4 h6 29.g4 ♖d6 30.♖d3 a5 31.a3 c5 32.dxc5+ bxc5 33.bxc5+ ♖xc5 34.♖c3 d4+ 35.♖d3 a4 36.g3 ♖d5 37.h3 ♖c5 38.h4 ♖d5 39.h5 [39.g5 hxg5 Stopping the pawns.] 39...g5 40.♖d2 ♖c4 41.♖c2 d3+ 42.♖d2 ♖d4 43.♖d1 ♖c3 44.♖c1 ♖b3 45.♖d2 ♖xa3 46.♖xd3 ♖b2 Black won in 13 more routine moves. Please notice that without the a-pawns, the game would still have been won for Black, as he would have walked his king toward the kingside pawns upon abandoning his d-pawn, as with the perhaps-more-obvious 43 ... ♖e3. 0-1

As can be seen, there are times when one may steer a game toward a favorable endgame, and there are times, when one side or the other has a long-term, structural weakness (rather than a short-term, dynamic weakness), when middlegame moves are made with an eye toward reaching a favorable endgame--or, reciprocally, with an eye toward not reaching an unfavorable one. The gods may have placed the middlegame before the endgame, but they have not also forced us to make the transition from one to the other blindly.
